Creative students 'trace the line'

MORE than 300 London pupils have taken part in Art on the Underground's Labyrinth Schools Exhibition, Tracing the Line.

The students worked with three artists in a series of innovative workshops to create pieces of art inspired by Mark Wallinger's Labyrinth – a unique artwork at every Underground station celebrating 150 years of the Tube.

The workshops saw students visit their local Tube station to meet London Underground staff, see their local Labyrinth artwork and work with artists Beth Atkinson, Holly Graham and Anne Harild to make drawings, sound recordings and photographs.

Louise Coysh, Art on the Underground manager at London Underground, said: 'I'm really impressed with the creativity these young Londoners have shown while working with artists Beth, Holly and Anne.'

Tube customers will be able to see the resulting artwork through a combination of posters and Tracing the Line exhibitions at nine Underground stations. There is also an online exhibition celebrating the creativity of these young Londoners: art.tfl.gov.uk/labyrinth/tracing-the-line/

Cycle hires reach 30 million

TfL has announced that Barclays Cycle Hire has had more than 30 million hires since it launched in July 2010.

Nick Aldworth, general manager of Barclays Cycle Hire said: 'To hit 30 million hires in less than four years is a reflection of how the scheme has quickly become an affordable and attractive travel option for Londoners and visitors alike. With more than 3 million hires already this year and record levels of customer satisfaction, we look forward to breaking more records throughout the rest of the year.'
